"Terrapin Ramble"

2542 North Farm Road

Private

DESCRIPTION:

"Terrapin Ramble" consists of a frame primary dwelling house, a small frame tenant house, and a log outbuilding. The main house faces southeast. It is a two-story, five-bay by one-bay frame structure with a rubble stone foundation, aluminum siding, and a gable roof with asphalt shingles. There is a two-story modern addition on the northeast and another on the southwest. The first story has a center entrance with sidelights that have three lights over one panel, and a four-light transom. This is flanked by two six-over-six sash. There is a five-bay, one-story porch that has four chamfered posts, railings with square balusters, and a modillion cornice. The first story has a hall-parlor plan. The front entrance opens into the northeast room. This room contains a straight run stair in the center of the house, and it has a turned walnut newel post with a heavy urn profile and turned balusters. There is a fireplace at the northeast end, and it has a wood mantel with plain pilaster strips. The southwest room has a fireplace at the northeast end with a wood mantel that has plain pilaster strips and a fleur de lis in the center of the frieze.

SIGNIFICANCE:

The "Terrapin Ramble" farm consisted of 109 acres that the Brown family purchased before 1814, probably as a tenant property, and sold in 1861 to Sophia Daley, wife of William Daley of Baltimore City. The Daleys apparently made substantial improvements to the property; one of these was likely the existing house, based on its details. The large, rather heavy "urn profile" newel post came into fashion in the 1850s and continued so into the 1870s; the stair brackets are consistent with this period, as well. The window sash, pinned together and with six lights, could be found up through the 1860s, but were becoming less and less stylish every year. The Daleys moved to San Francisco and sold the farm in 1865 to Johanna Herrmann. Herrmann was a German immigrant and a widow in her 60s, living in Baltimore City, and she apparently purchased the farm for her son, Martin. Martin Herrmann never married. Johanna Herrmann left the farm to her son when she died in 1887, and he left it to his housekeeper, Laura Ridgely, when he died in 1896. Ridgely married Caswell MacKenzie, and they apparently lived on the farm until her death c. 1918. Caswell remarried and stayed on the farm until 1934. The former farm land is now covered with houses.

DESCRIPTION

The Herrmann-MacKinzie Farm is located at 2542 North Farm Road, on the west side of the road and west of a line of new houses built along the west side of the road, about 4 miles northwest of Ellicott City in northeastern Howard County, Maryland. The farm consists of a frame primary dwelling house, a small frame tenant house, and a log outbuilding.

Primary Dwelling House

The main house faces southeast. It is a two-story, five-bay by one-bay frame structure with a rubble stone foundation, aluminum siding, and a gable roof with asphalt shingles. There is a two-story modern addition on the northeast and another on the southwest. The southeast elevation has a raised basement. The first story has a center entrance with sidelights that have three lights over one panel, and a four-light transom. This is flanked by two six-over-six sash with faux shutters on each side. There is a five-bay, one-story porch that is set on stone piers, with lattice between them. It has four chamfered posts, railings with square balusters, and a modillion cornice. The porch has a hip roof with standing seam metal. The second story has five shorter six-over-six sash. The box cornice is covered with aluminum. There is an interior brick chimney between the center and south bays and at the northeast gable end. The gable ends are covered by the non-historic additions.

The first story has a hall-parlor plan, and it is not possible to determine if a wall was removed. The window sash are mortised and tenoned and pinned at the corners only, and have narrow ovolo muntins. The architrave has a quirked ogee and bevel backband and a beaded interior edge. The door panel moulds also have a quirked ogee and bevel. The front entrance opens into the northeast room. This room contains a straight run stair in the center of the house, and it has a turned walnut newel post with a heavy urn profile and turned balusters. The handrail is also of walnut, with a profile that is rounded on the ends and raised in the center, and the handrail is not ramped. There are jig-sawn stair brackets. The stairway has a landing at the northwest end, with the handrail being circular, and hence there are no newel posts at the landing. There is a fireplace at the northeast end, and it has a wood mantel with plain pilaster strips. The firebox has been rebuilt with fire brick. The southwest room has a fireplace at the northeast end with a wood mantel that has plain pilaster strips and a fleur de lis in the center of the frieze. This fireplace is set against the stairway, and the firebox has been rebuilt with fire brick.

The second story has a center passage with two chambers. The southwest chamber does not have a fireplace, but has a wood mantel similar to those on the first story. There is a small closet door with drawers in it on the southeast side of the chamber. The architrave and doors match those of the first story.

The basement has log joists that run northwest-southeast. There are two three-light casement windows on the northwest wall of the southwest room. They are hung on leather hinges fastened with cut nails and there is no evidence of other hinges on these windows. There are two brick piers on the northeast side of the southwest basement room, to support the fireplace above. The northeast room northeast wall is corbelled out at the top to support the fireplace, with a hearth support of boards next to the corbelling. The stone here is parged. There is infill below the stairs suggesting that they continued to the basement originally. The log joist on the northeast side of the stairway is cut back on the northeast side, in the center. It is not clear whether the stairs were changed, or whether there was a heating grate installed here.

Tenant House

About 25 feet northwest of the main house is a smaller frame dwelling that faces southeast. It is a 1½-story, three-bay by one-bay frame structure with brick veneer on the southeast that is old brick but was installed in the twentieth century. The house has a rubble stone basement with a chimney support at the northeast end, and has a gambrel roof with a southwest-northeast ridge. The foundation for the house is only under the two bays to the northeast, and was added to under the southwest end where the stairway is, indicating that the building was enlarged by one bay. The frame has half-lapped sills and there is brick nogging in the rear wall. The first story has sash-sawn joists that run northwest-southeast. The fireplace trimmers have through tenons with exposed pegs. The two northeastern bays are divided from the southwest bay by a rubble stone wall that has a doorway in it that may be original. The first-story sash have parting beads, are mortised and tenoned and pinned at the corners, and are six-over-six. On the interior, there is a straight run stair on the southwest end that has a square newel post and balusters and probably dates to the 1920s. There is a closet beneath the stairway with a door that has lying panels.

The first story has clamshell mouldings. The second story has twentieth-century nine-over-nine sash and doors with five lying panels and head-cut trim. The roof is modern.

Log Outbuilding

On the east side of the small dwelling is a one-story log outbuilding that has V-notch corners. This building appears to predate the small dwelling, since the chinking on the southwest elevation appears to be smoothly plastered. The gable roof framing on this one-bay square structure is new, with a northeast-southwest ridge and asphalt shingles. It is cantilevered to the northeast. There is a vertical-board door on the southeast elevation and steps and a doorway added to the northeast to get access to the upper story. The building was probably a smoke house, but there is no clear evidence of this surviving on the interior.

The Daleys moved to San Francisco and sold the farm in 1865 to Johanna Herrmann. Herrmann was a German immigrant and a widow in her 60s, living in Baltimore City, and she apparently purchased the farm for her son, Martin. Martin Herrmann never married. Johanna Herrmann left the farm to her son when she died in 1887, and he left it to his housekeeper, Laura Ridgely, when he died in 1896. Ridgely married Caswell MacKenzie, and they apparently lived on the farm until her death c. 1918. Caswell remarried and stayed on the farm until 1934. The former farm land is now covered with houses.

Significance:

The "Terrapin Ramble" farm consisted of 109 acres that John Riggs Brown (10-27-1775 – 10-3-1814) purchased for $2,450 some time before his death in 1814. The farm was resurveyed by John Cord in 1799 and patented as "Terrapin Ramble," but the history of its usage up to that time, and in the years after until it was sold to Brown, is not known. Brown was a descendant of the "Patuxent Ranger," Thomas Browne, and inherited the family homestead known as "Good Fellowship," where he lived. Brown was a lieutenant in Maj. Charles Sterrett Ridgely's Third Regiment of the Cavalry Division of the Maryland Militia, and it is believed that he died of wounds received at the Battle of North Point. Brown was probably buying this farm as a tenant property in the short term, and perhaps for a son in the future. The deed for the farm was not executed until after his death, and was held by his widow and their children. Brown's widow, Sarah Gassaway Brown, died in 1855. It is not known if any of the children ever farmed this property, though it appears unlikely. The Brown family sold the farm in 1861 for $2,650 to Sophia Daley, wife of William Daley of Baltimore City. Less than two years later the Daleys sold the farm to Ann Hunt and leased it back from her, subject to an annual rent of $120. Daley was assessed for four additional horses, five additional cows, and "other things" not enumerated, worth $490, around the same time. The creation of a ground rent on the farm apparently provided cash for Daley to stock the farm and acquire necessary tools, and could have also provided funds to improve or replace some of the buildings. What changes they may have made are unknown, but they had little time to effect them, since they moved to San Francisco and sold the farm in 1865 to Johanna Herrmann (11-21-1803 – 2-15-1887) for $2,500.¹

Johanna Herrmann was a German immigrant and a widow in her 60s, living in Baltimore City, and she apparently purchased the farm for her son, Martin (4-9-1836 – 8-7-1896), who had immigrated, as well. She added another 44 acres that she bought from Upton Dorsey seven years later for $1,466.83. The fact that the Daleys only paid the ground rent, but sold the farm to Herrmann for $2,500 suggests that they made substantial improvements to the property. One of these was likely the existing house. The large, rather heavy "urn profile" newel post came into fashion in the 1850s and continued so into the 1870s; the stair brackets are consistent with this period, as well. The window sash, pinned together and with six lights, could be found up through the 1860s, but were becoming less and less stylish every year. The simple mantels are consistent with this period, but difficult to date closely because of their simplicity. The house is rather large for Herrmann, a bachelor, to have built unless he was planning to wed and the arrangements fell through. Both outbuildings were probably on the farm when the Daleys got here, but due to renovations too little of the earlier house could be viewed to date it. It certainly would have sufficed for Martin Herrmann until a greater need arose.

Johanna was probably married to Jacob B. Herrmann (7-20-1798 – 2-15-1861), who is buried near her and Martin at St. John's Cemetery. Their tombstones are inscribed in German, indicating that they had not completely acculturated as late as the 1880s. The 1860 census has Johanna and Martin living in Baltimore City, with a boarder, and Jacob was nowhere to be found. In 1870 Johanna was still in Baltimore, and Martin could not be located, even though he must have been living on the farm in Howard County. Martin was listed as a farmer in Howard County in 1880 and by this time Johanna was living with him, along with a housekeeper, Laura Ridgely, and a laborer who boarded with them, William King. Martin Herrmann never married. Johanna Herrmann left the farm to her son when she died in 1887, and he left it to his housekeeper, Ridgely, when he died in 1896. Martin Herrmann's brothers, sisters, nieces, and nephews also deeded the property to Ridgely, suggesting that there may have been some kind of settlement amongst them to preclude a law suit over the will. Laura Ridgely married Caswell MacKenzie, and they apparently lived on the farm until her death c. 1918. Caswell
